NEW QUESTION: 1

What Is the Author's Father Like?

It was an impressive place: old, solidly built, in the Tudor style, with leaded windows, a slate roof, and rooms of royal proportions. Buying it had been a big step for my parents, a sign of growing wealth. This was the best neighborhood in town, and although it was not a pleasant place to live (especially for children), its prestige outweighed its deadliness. Given the fact that he wound up spending the rest of his life in that house, it is ironic that my father at first resisted moving there. He complained about the price (a constant theme), and when at last he relented, it was with grudging bad humor. Even so, he paid in cash.

All in one go. No mortgage, no monthly payments. It was 1959, and business was going well for him.

Always a man of habit, he would leave for work early in the morning, work hard all day, and then, when he came home (on those days he did not work late), take a short nap before dinner. Sometime during our first week in the new house, before we had properly moved in, he made a curious kind of mistake. Instead of driving home to the new house after work, he went directly to the old one, as he had done for years, parked his car in the driveway, walked into the house through the back door, climbed the stairs, entered the bedroom, lay down on the bed, and went to sleep. He slept for about an hour.

Needless to say, when the new mistress of the house returned to find a strange man sleeping in her bed, she was a little surprised. But unlike Goldilocks, my father did not jump up and run away. The confusion was eventually settled, and everyone had a good laugh. Even today, it still makes me laugh. And yet, for all that, I cannot help regarding it as a pathetic story. It is one thing for a man to drive to his old house by mistake, but it is quite another, I think, for him not to notice that anything has changed inside it.

- Paul Auster, from The Invention of Solitude (1982)

Based on the excerpt, how does the author feel about his father's life?

- A. His father was often cruel, but always had good intentions.
- B. His father was impressive and strong, like the house where they lived.
- C. His father was a great businessman.
- D. His father was a financial genius.
- E. His father lived a sad, lonely life.

Answer: E

Explanation:

Explanation/Reference:

Explanation:

The bulk of this excerpt is the story that the author finds "pathetic," so the most logical conclusion regarding his feelings for his father is that he lived a sad life. We know that his business was going well, but the author does not discuss his father's methods or approach to business, so choice a is incorrect.

Choice c is likewise incorrect; there is no discussion of his father's handling of financial affairs. Choice d is incorrect because there is no evidence that his father was ever cruel. His father may have been impressive and strong (choice e), but the dominant theme is his habitual nature and the sad fact that he did not notice things changing around him.
